SAY IT WITH COMMENTS

The editor frequently receives communications from readers of the Journal in which the writers disagree with the reasoning or conclusions of some article, comment or case note. These communications are regularly of striking merit and could be expanded into three or four page comments of real interest and value to the profession. In all cases the writers indicate they do not want their suggestions printed. The editor welcomes these communications as expressions of genuine interest in—and not hostility to—the efforts of the editorial staff, but feels that the writers should be willing to give the readers of the Journal the benefit of their criticisms. We shall be glad to publish discussions in the form of letters, when authorized, but shall appreciate even more the opportunity to publish them in the form of comments.
